Choose whether to enable or disable the toolbar 1. AOL – AOL was a popular global Internet service provider and web portal that was acquired by Time Warner in the United States in May 2009, and rebranded as Time Warner. It was one of the first major companies to make the transition from dial-up to broadband Internet access, AOL was founded by media pioneer Steve Case in 1985 and began as a subscription service with one computer. Soon after its founding, the company began offering free accounts to the public in the United States, AOLs first online service was posted on the ARPANET. As the Internet moved from the ARPANET into the world, AOL was one of the first companies to offer a Web browser that incorporated HTML and Internet standards. The company became famous for its distinctive yellow and blue logo, advertisements that emphasized its entertainment focus, and real-time conversations that followed the presentation of information, especially in the form of an online chat. AOL was known for its use of search technology to help its users find the information they were seeking, the company was also noted for the prominence of its chat system in its real-time news site, AOLNews. This was one of the few news sites that reached most of the public that had not been bought up by Microsoft. Over time, AOLs core online services focused on delivering music and video, as the company expanded outside the U. S. it incorporated the then-popular video game Grand Theft Auto into AOL instant messaging and later expanded the online gaming feature to cover all of AOLs products. The company also added a series of feature-rich web portal sites, through the 2000s, AOLs revenue was driven mostly by advertising and subscription fees. In 2004, AOL became the first U. S. company to have a monthly subscription priced higher than $100, in 2005, AOLs subscription fee was more than $115, up from $59.99 the year before. In early 2005, AOL launched a news service called Netcenter, after it was spun off from the company. In May 2007, Time Warner announced that
