The first was the DARPA challenge which showed the feasibility of a program that mimics the process of human vision. The second was the Invited talk, Keynote, and KDDNI workshop. Here we have interviewed one of the key individuals behind these two great projects, François Chollet, Chief Architect of Google Research. Q: First, could you provide a brief introduction of your research background? I am a machine learning expert at Google, where I am involved in research in a number of areas. I received a Ph.D. in Electrical Engineering at the Ecole Normale Supérieure in Paris. My doctoral advisor was Pascal Vincent, who is now the CTO at Youtube. I then spent about 10 years working at Inria, France's national institute for research in computer science and engineering. I am currently the Chief Architect of Google Research and continue to work in Machine Learning. Q: What are some of the key issues or problems you are currently working on? There is a range of problems in machine learning that we are currently working on. Some of the most important include: Deep Learning, which deals with large-scale data and algorithms for processing it; and Generative Models, which aim to create new data rather than just make predictions on what is already known. We are also focusing a lot on Meta-Learning, which is the study of learning algorithms that can adapt to a wide range of different tasks or situations. Q: It is said that the major breakthrough in deep learning was ImageNet, which is an image dataset with 10 million images. Could you please talk about the usage of this dataset in the deep learning field? ImageNet is a set of images in natural scenes, of which roughly 10 million are labelled with human generated labels. The labels include objects, animals, and a number of different scenes, such as "people playing tennis", "dog playing piano", and so on. This dataset is used as a benchmark in the field. It is not, however, an important part of our
