A: You can use StackWarp. Q: Extending the iterator of a list with custom methods I am trying to write a class in Python to store an object and it's attributes as a list in a file. This is the class:

class ObjectStore(object):
    def __init__(self, filename, object_list):
        """ Initializes the object storage with the object_list. """
        self.filename = filename
        self.object_list = object_list self.objects = []
        self.load()
    def get_object(self, object_name):
        """ Get a specified object in the object list by it's name. Returns None if there is no such object. """ for item in self.object_list:
            if item.__name__ == object_name:
                return item
        return None
    def add_object(self, object_name, object_object):
        """ Adds a new object to the list. """
        object = object_object()
        object.name = object_name
        self.object_list.append(object)
        return object
    def load(self):
        """ Reads the object list from the file and puts it in the object_list. """
        with open(self.filename, "r") as file:
            for line in
