While mobile workers are bringing a lot of value, they also create risks. Security remains a major challenge and mobile workers often use unsecure protocols and methods when they connect to the cloud. Managing this workforce and ensuring business-critical information stays secure is time consuming, expensive and complex. Simply put, we are all in the connected business now. In fact, the Gartner hype cycle for social business states that the "converged, social and mobile business models" have reached "peak hype." And in a connected world, collaboration is both the means and the end. Mobile, cloud and social technologies bring significant business advantages. According to Gartner, the top three reasons for the adoption of social business are: Social business will be key to achieving the digital transformation we have been talking about for years. Today's workers are bringing so much to the enterprise – and they want to share. Gartner research shows that 80% of social media users are already connected to their enterprise, and that 53% are doing so on multiple devices. This makes social business the next big, no-brainer. Social business is enabling the digital transformation that will ensure that businesses can: Access and manage business data, and deliver it where, when and how people need it Use insights and analytics to improve how business decisions are made Increase the customer lifetime value of the business Harness the power of mobile and cloud, enabling flexible, ubiquitous access, anytime, anywhere
