The US Food and Drug Administration (FDA) provides the most recent GRAS (generally regarded as safe) status to probiotics bacteria (Lactobacillus, Bifidobacteria) and their nutrient blends for specific health conditions or pathologies. The GRAS status of Lactobacillus, Bifidobacteria and their nutrient blends has been held in jeopardy since March 2015. This decision was justified by extremely low-level concentrations of probiotics in most available products containing such bacteria. However, the FDA's actions since this date have never been made available to the public. Here we describe the issues surrounding the return of probiotics, and the implications of the FDA's actions for consumers, producers, and the industry. We discuss the significance of the GRAS designation, its most important uses, how they affect the industry, how and why the FDA decided to take the status back to the Federal Register, and how these decisions affect consumers and production. Finally, we discuss the next steps for health-based probiotics in the United States.
