Dirty politics and dirty lists reveal dirty tricksÂ .Q: Should I trust the security of our website against XSS attack? I have a website with a login function (login.php) and I just noticed the username and password is coming from a file on our website. This file was first put in a folder with read permissions and then later on copied to webroot. Should I trust the security of our website against XSS attack? Is there a better way to keep the username and password safe? A: Don't store passwords in the file, use a library to handle the encryption etc. Even though the file was put into a folder with read permissions, that is a huge security flaw. A way to keep the username and passwords safe is to not store them in plain text in any file on the server. That being said, since this is a web app, there is no real danger of an attacker obtaining the source, loading it into their browser and viewing the passwords. An unencrypted website is vulnerable to directory traversal. If an attacker had access to a web server, they could traverse the directory until they find a valid login form, scrape for the username and password and log the victim in as the user. If you're looking for a way to prevent this kind of activity, you could implement a CAPTCHA on the login form. Q: How to remove last words on string of words using Java 8 streams? I have string "This is a string and this is a string" and I want to remove last words. The result must be "This is a string" only. I have this simple code but I get this error on the last word remove: Unhandled exception type IOException at repository.removePartOfText(text, partOfText, separator); java.io.IOException: Stream closed at java.io.BufferedReader. f30f4ceada
