AUSTIN, Texas—A study has found that vaping has no harmful effect on the lungs of pregnant women. Dr. Olaf Heuser, the principal investigator for the Harvard study and a professor of environmental medicine at the Brigham and Women’s Hospital, was quoted on MedPage Today as saying that the study results are, “really good news for both the public health and the vapers.” The new study has been in the works for the past five years and was funded through the National Institutes of Health and the U.S. Food and Drug Administration. It began this year and it is currently ongoing. Vaping is becoming more popular among adults, but it is still not acceptable for minors to do so. Just this week the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention advised pregnant women against using e-cigarettes. The study’s authors were looking at pregnant women ages 15-24 years, as well as women ages 35-44 and 45-54. They all consumed “cigalikes” or disposable e-cigarettes containing nicotine and no marijuana. The study used these newer devices because the most popular models from five to seven years ago were made of plastic.The present invention generally relates to an improved pipeline sampling tool for collecting a sample of fluid at the line-at-depth of an oil and gas well and more particularly to a sampler which is constructed so as to minimize surface turbulence and thereby improve the accuracy of the fluid analysis. During the drilling, completion and production of oil and gas wells there is often a need to monitor and sample various fluid parameters at the line-at-depth in the wellbore. For example, it may be desirable to take a sample of the formation fluid at various intervals during production and treat this as a production sample. It may also be desirable to take a sample of the formation fluid to determine its hydrocarbon content. This is particularly important when the formation fluid is under a hydrocarbon vapor pressure, since the formation can become contaminated if the vapor pressure is exceeded. In order to determine the hydrocarbon content of the fluid, it is necessary to determine the amount of hydrocarbon vapor or gas present in the fluid so as to accurately determine the quantity of hydrocarbon content of the formation. This can be accomplished by measuring the amount of gas in the fluid. As noted, it may also be necessary to obtain a sample of the formation fluid at various times during the production of the well. This is generally performed when the
