to terrorise a city is to give civilians the impression that they have no defence against the bully, or to make them feel powerless to defend themselves. If you run the risk of losing a job or losing a girlfriend or a boyfriend, there's even a corresponding increase in the inclination to commit violence. The trend-setting study that produced these results was written by a team of social psychologists at Binghamton University in New York and published in the Proceedings of the National Academy of Sciences. It's based on the infamous Stanford Prison Experiment, the study that led to Stanford University's destruction of its own medical school. The experiment was an attempt to study a social phenomenon that has been disputed over much of the last decade, namely whether a group of people tends to become more aggressive when an authority figure exercises authority over them. In 1982, a study of prison inmates was conducted to determine whether a group of prisoners would become more lawless if a guard had been put in charge, a situation that would almost surely end in bloodshed. There were two groups of 11 volunteers, half of whom were told they were running an experiment and half that they were being sentenced. All of the men in each group agreed to shave off their hair, wash it, and wear identical white T-shirts. The experiment started when the research team, led by Dr Philip Zimbardo, randomly assigned each convict to a cell that was either under the control of one of the researchers or under the control of one of the guards. The prisoners were told they were to act as prisoners under sentence of death for the duration of the test. In the end, of the 19 men in the sample, the researchers found that 10 were "depressed", four were "passive", and five were "aggressive". Of the prisoners in the control group, seven were depressed, one was passive, and one was aggressive. Of the guards in the control group, seven were "passive", eight were "depressed", and one was "aggressive". The researchers concluded that, even when controlled for a wide range of confounding variables, the guards were much more likely to be aggressive than the prisoners. Zimbardo has also insisted that the aggression came from the guards and not the prisoners, a claim that almost certainly has to be treated with the suspicion of wishful thinking given the statement by the study's leader that the cells "appeared to be more comfortable and humane". The experiment is infamous in the social sciences because it
