expression and activity for the prognostic outcome in colorectal cancer. The prognostic significance of cathepsin B expression and activity for colorectal cancer is unknown. We immunohistochemically investigated the relationship of cathepsin B expression and activity to clinicopathological characteristics and prognostic outcome in colorectal cancer. We also investigated the possibility of cathepsin B being a prognostic marker in colorectal cancer. Sixty-seven colorectal cancer specimens were analysed for cathepsin B expression and activity by immunohistochemistry and zymography. In 56 cases with survival data, the relationship to clinicopathological characteristics and patient prognosis was investigated. Cathepsin B expression was detected in 48 (74.2 %) tumours. Its expression was related to the level of differentiation and histological type, but not to stage and lymph node metastasis. Cathepsin B expression was related to local recurrence and lymph node metastasis and its activity to liver metastasis. Low and high cathepsin B expression were correlated with survival in patients with stage I and II disease, but not in stage III patients. Cathepsin B expression and activity were associated with histopathological features and patient survival. However, because of our small sample size, these findings need to be confirmed in a larger-scale study. This issue of our journal contains five interesting original articles that deal with reflux esophagitis (RE), which is the most common disorder of the digestive tract. The onset of RE is characterized by benign gastroduodenal reflux of alkaline contents leading to pathological esophageal epithelial changes and, eventually, erosions, ulcers, and reflux lumen diathesis (RLD). It is a common, but easily and expensively treatable, b7e8fdf5c8
