The new release of the Android app is indeed enhanced, and that not just in terms of features, but also in terms of security, among other things. Actually, the Premium edition of the UC Browser is the very same Android client that we are currently using in our home (for a review see our UC Browser review). There are only some minor differences regarding the interface, including a grid of new categories that cover a lot of topics and the addition of a share button to the browsers' tabs. The new release of the UC Browser for Android has been tested and we found that it has, however, an interesting feature for the desktop users, as it also shows the content of the keyboard, plus you can use the browser to open your links from anywhere without the need to open the apps from the Android market. This means that if you are writing a message on your phone and you need to type something, you can easily open the browser, type what you need and open the link by clicking the browser button of your keyboard. A new feature that we really like. If you don't have a number pad available, however, the browser doesn't handle that too well, it goes to the default browser. Another thing that is interesting about the new update, at least for the developers, is that now they can download and install their projects from the Market directly inside the UC Browser
