The neurodegenerative disorder, Type II diabetes mellitus (T2DM), is characterized by a failure to regulate insulin expression, insulin secretion, and metabolic homeostasis. In mammals, defects in insulin signaling are due to mutations in genes encoding calcium/calmodulin-dependent protein kinase II (CaMKII) or phosphatase calcineurin (CaN), and the resulting states are referred to as calcium-deficient stress (CDS), CDS-like (CDSL) and T2DM. Here, we report that CaN is an essential gene in Saccharomyces cerevisiae and that CaN deficiency does not have a profound effect on growth, metabolism, or osmotic stress responses. Moreover, we show that CaN deficiency does not cause defects in calcium homeostasis, the Ca(2+) ion channel Yvc1p, or G protein beta-gamma activity. These results indicate that, unlike CaMKII, CaN is not required for the maintenance of calcium homeostasis in S. cerevisiae. Furthermore, our work supports the idea that the molecular pathways mediating pathologic and compensatory responses to CDS in mammals can be studied in S. cerevisiae without the confounding factor of calcium homeostasis.Subacromial impingement syndrome: a review of the evidence-based and non-evidence-based treatment modalities. Subacromial impingement syndrome is a common condition for which the treatment decisions are complex. Most studies have been of low methodologic quality and the findings are, therefore, often inconclusive. We reviewed the evidence supporting five treatment modalities commonly used by physiotherapists: shoulder exercises, injection, surgery, arthroscopy and 0cc13bf012
