Mastoparan, a secretin analogue, elicits a temporally regulated increase in intracellular free Ca²⁺ in cultured human alveolar epithelial cells. Mastoparan, a member of the tetradecapeptide family of mastoparan-like peptides, is a potent inducer of phosphatidylinositol hydrolysis and stimulates Ca²⁺ release from intracellular stores in many cell types, including human alveolar epithelial cells. Its action involves a cell surface receptor and a Ca²⁺-initiated intracellular pathway that results in an increase in the free cytosolic Ca²⁺ concentration ([Ca²⁺]_i). In the present study, a fluorescent probe, Fura2-AM was used to examine the effects of mastoparan on [Ca²⁺]_i in cultured human alveolar type II cells. Maintained on microporous filters, these cells received mastoparan as an aerosol. Mastoparan evoked an increase in [Ca²⁺]_i in a concentration-dependent manner, with a half-maximal concentration of about 1.2 nM. This response was completely abolished by pretreatment with 10 microM pertussis toxin. The elevation in [Ca²⁺]_i induced by mastoparan began as soon as 5 min after the onset of exposure to the peptide, reached peak at 10-20 min and then declined gradually. The time-course of the response to mastoparan was fully mimicked by the secretin analogue, vasoactive intestinal peptide. The increase in [Ca²⁺]_i was not significantly different from that in cells incubated with vasoactive intestinal peptide.
