Field of the Invention This invention relates to a method of and apparatus for delivering relatively large quantities of molten metal to a mold. 2. Prior Art In the prior art method of pouring molten metal from one vessel or location to another it has been common practice to utilize refractory material as the delivery conduit. Commonly refractory lined pouring chutes are utilized

wherein metal is forced from the vessel through a passage in the chute. It is difficult to achieve the exact level of the metal at the discharge end of the chute. A common practice is to scrape the bottom of the chute and to subsequently refill the chute with new materials. This method, however, is not entirely satisfactory in that there is no uniformity in the flow of the metal. Another common method is to utilize a crane and a crane bucket to manipulate an arm which carries the bucket which is filled with molten metal. With this method the operator must be in close proximity with the material at all times and may be subjected to fumes, noxious gases and other characteristics of the material. In addition
