electron transfer reactions. Part 2: the concept of perfunctory reactivity. A recent paper presented the notion of "topological" reactivity. According to it, the reaction of a given compound with transition metal complexes is not governed by the electronic properties of the metals, but by the topology of the reaction energy surface. This paper provides a complete treatment of this concept and discusses its generalization to reactions in the polarizable continuum. The formal analogy to the concept of perfunctory reactivity, developed for the reaction of alkyl halides with transition metal complexes in aqueous solutions, is shown. The perfunctory character of a reactivity is discussed with respect to the sign and magnitude of the calculated transition state barrier.<sup>1</sup> Field of the Invention The invention relates to a substrate holding apparatus for holding substrates, such as semiconductor wafers. 2. Description of the Related Art To perform a process on a substrate such as a semiconductor wafer, such a substrate is held by a substrate holding apparatus. The substrate holding apparatus of this type has advantages in that it can hold both sides of a semiconductor wafer as compared with conventional substrate holding apparatuses having a plate or film having only a single elastic surface plate. Such a substrate holding apparatus having elastic surface plates is generally provided with
