During an alpha preview event at SEGA's San Francisco offices, SEGA Worldwide Studios boss John Kodera and SEGA's senior vice president of consumer products, Yusuke Hashimoto, unveiled more information on the game, while SEGA's Lead Motion Capture Producer, Alex Kaczmarek, explained that the data is used not only to make the game better, but also to further expand the service. "We're trying to tackle a big feature that I believe is a large gap in the industry, and that is the ability to connect games and motion,” said Koderu. “It’s something that has existed at an individual level, but this is the first time that the motion is powered by the game itself. This is the first time that we’re able to connect games and motion and we’re really excited about that.” “This is the first time that we can bring motion to the world of FIFA,” added Hashimoto. “And, of course, it’s [an] internal feature, so it’s not something that we can advertise, but I believe that it’s really powerful and I’m sure that the players will enjoy the feature itself.” “We believe that our motion technology is amazing and we’re still in the very early stages of that development. What you see from us is just a tiny piece of what it can do,” added Kaczmarek. “We’re working on it every single day, not only from a game perspective but from a technology perspective. And we’re working to further develop that as much as we can.” Shane Bettenhausen, vice president and general manager of SEGA Europe, added: “The motion features for FIFA have been updated and enhanced in the past, but what we’re doing with the new features is taking it into the future by adding things like ‘Vertical Launch’ and ‘Kick.’ The ‘Vertical Launch’ system doesn’t just follow the direction of the ball, but it also has the ability to change directions, as well as the ability to hit the wall to take the kick, all of which is powered by the animation data of a real-life player.” M
