The production of high-quality health care research is fundamental to transform the quality of care provided to patients. To support this challenge, there is an increasing interest in academic health science centers in developing departments or institutes of health sciences research. The purpose of this study was to determine the impact of such departments or institutes of health sciences research for healthcare providers and dental researchers. This systematic review was conducted using the PubMed, MEDLINE, CINAHL and Cochrane Library databases as well as websites of organizations concerned with professional practice. Ten databases were searched for English-language articles published between 2000 and 2015. The search strategy was based on the combination of keywords: 'dental research', 'health sciences research','research', 'clinical trial', 'health services research', 'public health research' and 'laboratory research'. The following inclusion criteria were used: original research, study design, full-text availability, and application of dental literature. Secondary data analysis was not undertaken. The final search was conducted on 18 March 2015. Forty-four eligible studies were included. This review found that the impact of institutes of health sciences research on healthcare providers was less evident than that on dental researchers. The impact of health sciences research on dental students and dental researchers was not evident. The development and evaluation of new health services were highly dependent on the number of patients receiving the service. The results showed that there were limited published studies focusing on the role of health sciences research and its effectiveness in dentistry in general and public health dentistry in particular. The identified studies reported limited information on both financial and process support for research. The findings suggest that research funding and reallocation from clinical services to research in dentistry needs to be further strengthened.
