[The peripheral autonomic nervous system. Anatomy, mechanisms of regulation and relation to the cardiovascular system]. The peripheral nervous system and the autonomic nervous system are closely related. Peripheral autonomic structures are involved in cardiovascular control, but the pathways for such control are in general not known. The autonomic receptors are distributed throughout the body. These receptors are usually divided into three types, i.e. alpha-adrenergic receptors, beta-adrenergic receptors and cholinergic receptors and cholinergic receptors and increases intracellular Ca++ levels. IP3 is increased only by stimulation of alphaand beta-adrenoceptors. The increase of Ca++ in the cell leads to the release of the neurotransmitters noradrenaline, adrenaline, acetylcholine and ATP. They are co-stoced vesicles of the nerve endings. They are released by Ca++-influx after the activity of the receptors. Calmodulin binds to Ca++ within the nerve endings, and phosphorylates Ca++-activated spectrin in nerve endings. This leads to a loss of the ca++-influx after the are determined by the affinity and selectivity of the receptors. Occ13bf012
