Half the animals were fed 100% of the intake (group A) and the other half, 50% of the intake (group B). When the animals were killed, all the animals were in negative energy balance, and there were no differences in live weight or empty weight. Protein retention was lower in group A than in group B. Protein degradation was similar between both groups, but protein degradation per animal was higher in group B than in group A. The percentage of enteric protein escaping protein degradation was lower in group B than in group A. The percentage of the difference explained by the increase in time of protein degradation was 46.4%. The losses of protein degradation fractions were higher in the animals of group A than in group B. In conclusion, when animals are fed 50% of their intake they achieve a higher protein deposition than when fed 100% of the intake.
