In printing presses, for example, a continuous web of paper is fed from a supply roll to an inking station where a print pattern or design is placed on the paper. The paper is then fed to a transfer roll or transfer cylinder which transfers the design or pattern from the inking roll or inking cylinders to the web. The web is then fed over an impression roll or impression cylinders which force the design or pattern onto the paper and onto the web. The paper is then fed to the back to an impression roller or back cylinder which presses the back of the web against the impression roll to complete the printing process. An example of a known double roll type of sleeve configuration is shown in FIG. 1. The double roll sleeve 1 has two side portions 2 and 3 which are combined together with an end portion 4 which connects the two side portions at their ends. The two side portions 2 and 3 are dimensioned to slide over a double roll cylinder 5 which forms part of the printing press. A back portion 6 is also coupled to the end portion 4 and forms an interior of the double roll sleeve 1. The double roll sleeve 1 is further fabricated as a unitary structure from a suitable metal material, such as steel, by a conventional means such as extrusion. The side portions 2 and 3 are constructed in a conventional manner of a metal material, such as steel, while the end portion 4 is fabricated of a suitable elastomeric material, such as a nitrile rubber or a silicone rubber, which elastomeric material extends over and grips the side portions 2 and 3. The back portion 6 is fabricated of a suitable rigid material, such as rigid polyvinylchloride, which also fills the interior area 7 between the side portions 2 and 3 and extends over the end portion 4. The use of a double roll sleeve for printing presses has resulted in several manufacturing problems. The relatively high cost of fabricating double roll sleeves, particularly because of 6d1f23a050
